

A SET OF FURS.—A New York Importer recently imported several cases of valuable Russian furs. The cases were duly inspected in order to make a fair assessment as to the tax which should be imposed upon the goods before delivering them over to the importer. Among the lot was a beautiful set which attracted an appraiser's attention, and he suddenly became of the opinion that it could be displayed to good advantage upon his wife's person. Suiting the action to the thought, he retained the set, nailed up the case, and marked upon it "passed." The case, on arriving at the importer's store, was opened, and it was discovered that the number of sets did not correspond with the invoice. The owner immediately laid the facts before a detective, gave him a description of the furs, and the latter went to work, and in the course of a few days discovered the furs upon the appraiser's wife's person. The fact was laid by the detectives before the Government official, who came to the conclusion "that it is better to suffer the ills we have than fly to others we know not of." and immediately sent a German to his residence who requested of the lady of the house that Mr. Appraiser wished the set of furs which he had presented to her to be sent to him without delay." They were in due time transferred to the detective, and subsequently handed over to the importer: and inasmuch as a little consideration passed, the matter was hushed up.

General Butler, in an order relative to the seizure of property for military purposes, says: "While the theory adopted by some officers, that all the property in the Confederate States belongs to the negroes, because it is the product of their labor, is theoretically true, yet it is not such a truth as can be made the foundation of Government action. Therefore, negroes, while they are to be induced to join our marches and expeditions, are not to be allowed to bring with them any other than those personal effects which have belonged to them, or such property as the officer commanding may order."

It is stated in the Paris letters that the Emperor and Empress are very fond of strolling along the Boulevards and that the "august couple always choose a rainy night for their stroll; which they perform, arm-in-arm, under the screen of a big umbrella. They seldom talk to the stall people, but simply ask the price of everything that strikes their fancy; quietly leaving gold pieces, instead of copper or silver, on the counter, as they move away with a pleasant smile of a bow."
